JMP1 “Preferences for Taxing Personal Characteristics” (with Julien Senn)

Tagging—conditioning taxes on income and personal characteristics correlated with earning ability—can improve efficiency. However, its social acceptability remains uncertain, as it may conflict with horizontal equity, the principle that “equals” should be treated equally. We study citizens’ support for tagging in an online vignette experiment with the U.S. general population ( $N = 3012$ ). Our design manipulates three theoretically relevant features of characteristics: immutability, correlation with ability, and correlation with needs. Characteristics correlated with ability and needs receive higher support, consistent with theoretical prescriptions, while immutability does not significantly predict support, contrary to theory. Fairness concerns, capturing both horizontal and vertical equity, are the strongest predictor of support; other concerns also matter, but less so. We incorporate fairness into our theoretical model, which can limit or amplify tagging relative to the canonical utilitarian model. Finally, we synthesize insights from theory, our experiment, and practice.

JMP2: “Who Should Get Money? Estimating Welfare Weights in the U.S.” (with Francesco Capozza). Reject and Resubmit, American Economic Review (resubmitted).

Distinguished CESifo Affiliate Award in Public Economics 2024 (awarded to Francesco Capozza)

Evaluating the desirability of a reform typically involves weighing the gains of winners against the losses of losers using welfare weights, which measure the value that society places on a $1 increase in an individual’s consumption. We elicit the welfare weights of the U.S. general population using experiments and show their robustness, validity, and temporal stability. We estimate an income elasticity of welfare weights between  $-0.78$  and  $-0.70$ , which is roughly 5-9 times more progressive than the weights implied by U.S. tax and transfer policies. We use the estimated welfare weights to derive optimal income taxes.
