JMP1: “Preferences for Taxing Personal Characteristics” (with Julien Senn)

Tagging—conditioning taxes on income and personal characteristics correlated with earning ability—can improve efficiency but is commonly believed to conflict with horizontal equity, which stipulates treating “equals” equally. We study citizens’ support for tagging in an online vignette experiment with the U.S. general population ( $N = 3012$ ). Support for tagging is higher for characteristics correlated with ability and needs, consistent with theoretical prescriptions, while the immutability of a characteristic does not significantly predict support, contrary to theory. Fairness concerns, capturing both horizontal and vertical equity, are the strongest predictor of support; other concerns also matter, but less so. Incorporating fairness into the model can limit or amplify tagging relative to the canonical utilitarian benchmark. Finally, we synthesize insights from our experiment, theory, and practice.

JMP2: “Who Should Get Money? Estimating Welfare Weights in the U.S.” (with Francesco Capozza). Reject and Resubmit, American Economic Review (resubmitted).

Distinguished CESifo Affiliate Award in Public Economics 2024 (awarded to Francesco Capozza)

Evaluating the desirability of a reform typically involves weighing the gains of winners against the losses of losers using welfare weights, which measure the value that society places on a $1 increase in an individual’s consumption. They can capture various normative ideals like utilitarianism and equality of opportunity. We elicit the welfare weights of the U.S. general population using experiments and show their robustness, validity, and temporal stability. We estimate an income elasticity of welfare weights between  $-0.78$  and  $-0.70$ , which is roughly 5-9 times more progressive than the weights implied by U.S. tax and transfer policies. The optimal marginal tax rates based on our estimates of welfare weights are 28-30 percentage points higher, on average, than the current tax rates in the U.S.
